The English king George the Second's wife, the queen Caroline, was a woman of great talent and had so much power over him, that he generally let her reign, while he was absent himself. Once it occurred, that a poor Scottish girl, Helen Walker, was obliged to be a witness in the trial of her own sister. She was told, that by a few words she could save her life. But she would not say anything, which she did not know to be true. The sister was sentenced to death, and the same evening Helen set off on foot to London to beseech the queen to pardon her sister. She made her way to the queen, who, touched over her noble conduct, really pardoned the sister.
